

After decades of being both celebrated and dismissed as the exception within American exceptionalism, the South is emerging as central to debates in fields ranging from American studies and African American studies to cultural studies and postcolonial theory. Engaged with these debates from the outset, “the new southern studies,” as Houston Baker named the field, thus only secondarily reinvigorates the old. Rather, as its scholars look at the South afresh, their chief aim is a floor-to-ceiling rethinking of some of the central ideas of the last twenty years of critical theory: objecthood, identity, space, nation, region, abjection, the body, empire. The books in The New Southern Studies series are interdisciplinary, methodologically rigorous, and iconoclastic and will, as a result, engage scholars and students in a wide variety of fields.

“A visceral and invigorating study that takes us on a fantastic voyage through Southern bodies and narratives, providing superb and often startling readings of texts we thought we knew. Critically sophisticated, daring and eloquent, Reading for the Body offers a thrilling ride for aficionados of Southern and American literature.”

—John Wharton Lowe, Robert Penn Warren Professor, Louisiana State University

Apples and Ashes
Literature, Nationalism, and the Confederate States of America

Coleman Hutchison

“In addition to mounting a fresh and compelling inquiry into literary nationalism, Hutchison has written an excellent study of a people, time, and place judged by many, including some of the century’s most esteemed critics, to have produced no literature worth reading. Apples and Ashes makes a powerful case that the defeat of the Confederacy obscured the considerable merits of its literature.”

—Eric J. Sundquist, author of King’s Dream: The Legacy of Martin Luther King’s “I Have a Dream” Speech
